Ankle Sprains

Fall sports bring fall sprains and strains. As fall athletics and exercise ramp up, so does the risk for rolling an ankle. The great news is that ankle sprains do not always have to end your season or ruin your race.

Did you know that 23,000 individuals sprain their ankle every day? Chances are that if you move around on two feet, you have sprained your ankle. Ankle sprains can limit our ability to walk, play sports, or stand for our jobs.

What is an ankle sprain? The ankle has structures called ligaments which are thick bands that support, strengthen and maintain the ankle joint's stability during activity. When the ligaments are stretched too far, an ankle sprain occurs.

More than 90% of ankle sprains occur when the foot rolls underneath us--otherwise known as an inversion ankle sprain. There are three ligaments that attach to the outer side of the ankle which can be damaged with a "rolled" ankle. With an inversion ankle sprain, the pain and swelling will be localized to the outside of the ankle around the bony bump of the ankle.

Tips to prevent an ankle sprain:

- Incorporate balance exercises to your daily exercises
- Stand on one leg or with your feet together while turning your head side to side or with your eyes closed. To increase difficulty, stand on a couch cushion or foam pad.
- Exercises on a balance ball or BOSU ball (Call ActivePT for specific balance exercises on the BOSU ball)

After an ankle sprain, use the RICE principle:

- R = Rest, until you can comfortably bear weight again
- I = Ice often, but only until numb (consult a healthcare professional if you have impaired sensation or diabetes before icing).
- E = Elevate the foot to decrease swelling.
- C = Apply compression through a brace or "figure 8" wrapping technique

Ankle Sprain Do's and Don'ts
 Do complete an ankle rehab program. Without proper treatment, you are 80% more likely to sprain your ankle again. Physical therapy for ankle sprains has been shown to reduce the risk of future reinjury. Do apply use the RICE principle, apply low level laser, perform joint mobilization and certain taping techniques to decrease swelling and help you return to your sport more quickly. Don't return to competitive play or exercise on uneven ground if you still have noticeable swelling or moderate pain. Pain and swelling reduce how fast your ankle can react and puts you at risk for another injury.

If you have suffered an ankle sprain, request a physical therapy appointment. The sooner you start your therapy program, the sooner you get back to your game!

ActivePT offers free assessments.
 Schedule 15 minutes at no cost to evaluate any pain or injury and learn how best to treat your own pain.
